

There are hundreds of stupid ways to die. The Darwin Awards are dedicated to documenting the best of them.

In groups, imagine what might have happened and write the follow-up to the narrative.

Sometimes it really is reasonable to work “harder” and not “smarter”. In 1996, a man in Bulgaria attempted to clean his chimney.	..... ..... ..... ..... ..... .....
Darren's death was a puzzle. The 33-year-old was found slumped in the hallway of his house, bleeding from stab wounds. Had an assailant attacked him? Police could find no supporting evidence. A year later the inquest revealed why Darren can take his place among the stars of the Darwin Awards.	..... ..... ..... ..... ..... .....
Logistics was uppermost in the mind of a warehouse employee of Tanarumono Logistics. The worker needed to change a light bulb ten meters overhead and the forklift could only reach 2.5 meters, clearly not close enough.	..... ..... ..... ..... ..... .....
In 2008 46-year-old David Monk was on holiday in Italy, with a group of friends. After having a few beers one evening, the lads decided to steal a protective mat that covered the metal barriers at the bottom of the slope and use it as a sledge.	..... ..... ..... ..... ..... .....
In 2001, a story appeared in the South Idaho Press detailing the death of a man named Marco, who had been driving a van full of friends back from a day on the mountain when his brakes failed.	..... ..... ..... ..... ..... .....
